Video.Breast cancer refers to a cancerous tumor that develops in the lining of the breast. The two most common types of breast cancers are invasive ductal carcinoma and invasive lobular carcinoma. In addition to the two common types of breast cancer, tumors may occur in other sites in the body, such as the lymph nodes and/or blood vessels. The prognosis of patients depends on the type of breast cancer, as well as the stage at which it was detected. Breast cancer staging is a process that classifies the extent to which cancer has invaded and spread from the breast into the breast tissue and/or the surrounding lymph nodes and/or blood vessels, and eventually other parts of the body. Breast cancer staging is a process that classifies the extent to which cancer has invaded and spread from the breast into the breast tissue and/or the surrounding lymph nodes and/or blood vessels, and eventually other parts of the body. Breast cancer staging usually involves obtaining a tissue sample from a breast lump by way of a biopsy, and carrying out a histological examination of the sample. This examination may be performed in a clinical setting (e.g., a hospital or clinic) or may be carried out in a laboratory setting (e.g., a pathology lab or a laboratory). In either setting, histological examination can be done manually or by using an automated tissue staining device, such as a tissue stainer. A representative manual tissue staining procedure involves placing a breast tissue sample in a container or cassette (such as, for example, a sample container or cassette) that includes at least one stainable stain, such as hematoxylin and eosin (H&E).
